NICOLE TRACY
VINEYARD MANAGER

As a student at the University of San Francisco, Nicole's driving passion was a desire to support our increasingly delicate ecosystem. This passion, paired with a commitment to the restoration and enhancement of environmental biodiversity, guided her into the niche of biodynamic farming.

Shortly after she received her BS in Environmental Science and an MS in Environmental Management, she moved to Maine and worked on an organic farm, focusing on produce care & cultivation and animal husbandry. Working with the land proved rewarding and Nicole chose to stay involved with outdoor farming as her career progressed. After a successful season in Maine, she headed back home to Southern California and landed in Malibu, managing a highly respected biodynamic edible farm. In addition to her lengthy list of roles and responsibilities, she became an educator and proponent of the biodynamic farming philosophy and practices.

In 2017, Nicole once again felt the pull of Northern California. She missed the small sustainable and organic communities and, more importantly, wanted to be a part of the innovative and eccentric visionaries embracing changes in farming practices in an effort to combat the harmful effects of climate change. As luck would have it, she landed in the vineyards and began honing her biodynamic skills in wine farming.

Having worked solely with biodynamic farms, she embraces a passion for the environment and a philosophy of holistic healing. We are grateful for Nicole's nurturing "Earth Mama" instincts and the unique background she brings to Eco Terreno Wines and Vineyards.
